Time Out says

The life of Steven Penfold, a 40-year-old poet who isolates himself in his council flat with no job, friends or prospects, turns on its head when attractive law student Clare moves in. There are no airs and graces in Birtill's writing and Conrad Blakemore's naturalistic direction. Together they portray the bitterness and melancholy of Steven with comic intuition, while also demonstrating his vulnerability. The result is funny and entertaining, but after numerous frank exchanges between Steven and Clare, the play suddenly winds up with a strangely premature happy ending.
